To begin with people can feel very differently about the British royal family, depending on their background, their political views or their character. On the one hand, some love the glamour, the entertainment factor, or the traditional side. On the other (hand), it has been argued that they are a waste of taxpayers' money. For a start, some of the family members expect to have a private life while holding a public position. Secondly, they are born into wealth instead of earning it through hard work, unlike many ordinary citizens. Last but not least, we have proof all over the world that societies can function well without a royal family. Despite the arguments against their existence, as long as they earn a living I can accept being in a monarchy. I would say to conclude that unless there's a revolution I don't see them disappearing any time soon.
